

TIME

THE WEEKLY NEWS MAGZINE

BATTLE FOR UKRAINE

American man, 23, dies in Ukraine after he snuck out of father's Washington home to join war
P.2

Russia warns of
'consequences'
if US missiles go to Ukraine
P.5

RUSSIA UKRAINE
WAR

Why Your New Year's Resolution Should Be to Eat More Fiber

The start of a new year is a great time to check in with yourself and think about how you want to improve for the year ahead. But unfortunately, many New Year's resolutions aren't realistic and wind up lasting just two to three weeks. Here's a resolution that's easy to stick to and can also make a big difference in your overall health and wellness: eat more fiber. Fiber can play an important role in reaching your health and wellness goals in 2019. It's probably best known for its ability to help keep your digestive system moving, but there are other benefits as well – like helping to promote a feeling of fullness. Even with fiber's well-known health benefits, nine out of 10 Americans aren't getting enough in their daily diet, according to the National Health and

Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) 2015-2016.

Lauren Harris-Pincus, MS, RDN thinks she knows why. "Fiber can be confusing," Harris-Pincus explains. "I think many people have experienced tummy trouble when they ate too much fiber and it overwhelmed their digestive system. With a simple strategy of introducing fiber slowly, they can receive all the health benefits without any discomfort." The 2015-2020 Dietary Guidelines for Americans recommend that women get 25 grams and men get 38 grams of fiber every day, but most only average 15 grams. Instead of aiming for 25-38 grams on day one, Harris-Pincus has some tips on how you can make this resolution stick: * Only increase your fiber intake by three to five grams each day. That way, you give your body time to adjust. * Mix in high-fiber foods with your regular diet. As you're ramping up your fiber intake, start by adding fiber to foods you already eat. It could be as simple as adding a high-fiber cereal to a yogurt parfait or adding nuts and berries to your salad.* Drink more water. Insoluble fiber doesn't dissolve in water, so make sure you drink plenty of fluids to help carry the fiber through your body. By eating more fiber and drinking more water, you're helping your digestive system do its job more efficiently.* Find a great-tasting fiber you love. Instead of viewing fiber as a chore, or something you "have to" eat, find a high-fiber option that you can look forward to eating. "I think everyone has this idea of fiber as bland and boring," Harris-Pincus says. "But what people don't realize is that there are tons of great-tasting, high-fiber foods. The easiest place to start is with your morning cereal." Fiber One recently introduced a new fiber-rich cereal that, well, doesn't taste like a fiber-rich cereal. Fiber One Strawberries and Vanilla Clusters is made with real strawberries and sweet vanilla clusters, but still contains 35 percent of the Daily Value of fiber in every one-cup serving. No pills, nothing to stir, just real food that makes fiber something you can enjoy eating.

And for when you're ready to increase your fiber intake even more, Fiber One Honey Clusters has 40 percent of the Daily Value of fiber, and Fiber One Original Bran has 55 percent. Beyond cereal, Harris-Pincus recommends eating whole fruits and vegetables, leaving the skin on things like apples and potatoes. Beans and legumes are another excellent source of fiber, so don't shy away from the black beans in your fajitas. For easy snacks, popcorn is another fiber-rich option with four grams of fiber in just three cups of popcorn. "Fiber really is overlooked, which is a shame because it can be this great-tasting, powerhouse nutrient," Harris-Pincus explains. "New Year's resolutions are usually all about cutting calories or increasing protein, when in reality fiber can do all these amazing things for your body. You just have to start eating more of it to realize the benefits."

American man, 23, dies in Ukraine after he snuck out of father's Washington home to join war

Call them "Generation Stressed." Millions of Americans just made their New Year's resolutions, and – while eliminating stress tops the list for many of them – it's especially important to Millennials. Nearly half of them say they're stressed all the time over everything from money to work, according to a recent survey, and even spending time around "anxious" people can set them off. That same survey also found that Millennials are overwhelmingly looking for an easy solution. One possible answer? Incorporating Japanese Green Tea into one's daily routine, since it naturally contains the amino acid L-theanine that can help elevate moods and calm worried minds. (Hey, it's steeped in Zen tradition.) See the full-sized image here to also learn which hours stress Millennials out most.

One of the biggest attacks of the war' slams into Ukraine's capital

Five words or less(NewsUSA) – Most teachers will tell you that there is nothing more exciting than seeing the "lightbulb moment," when, suddenly, everything clicks and a student understands a new concept.

And most parents will tell you that seeing their children develop a "spark of inspiration" about a new subject, topic, or interest can be incredibly heartwarming and encouraging.

The idea of school choice combines the need for more "lightbulb moments" and "sparks of inspiration" in our country. Simply put: school choice gives students the opportunity to attend schools that meet their learning styles and encourage their interests at the same time.

OECD: War in Ukraine to drag on global economy into 2023

we celebrate the importance of opportunity in education, raising awareness of all different types of schools that are available to American families.

We recognize that every child is unique, and that a one-size-fits-all approach to education doesn't properly serve students of all stripes, from all backgrounds, with every type of need, passion, and skillset.

One student might thrive in a traditional public school while another student might find her passion at a magnet school, a charter school, a private or parochial school, a virtual school, or through homeschooling.

School choice doesn't mean elevating one school, sector, or program above another. Instead, it is about matching students with learning environments that meet their individual needs – and about providing the highest-quality education to the next generation.

If you are searching for a new or different school for your child – so that you can see more of those "lightbulb moments" and "sparks of inspiration" in your household – January is the time to start your school search.

Many school and scholarship applications will be due soon, so it's a great opportunity to attend school open houses and fairs and find out what school is best for your child. In fact, more than 40,500 events and activities are planned during National School Choice Week, and you can learn more at www.schoolchoiceweek.com.

Russian strikes on Ukrainian capital thwarted

We are just weeks away from the nation's largest annual celebration of opportunity in education. That celebration is called National School

Choice Week, and it is taking place in every neighborhood and community, through 40,594 independently-planned events and activities. At open houses, school fairs, coffeehouse meet-ups, rallies, and more, millions of Americans – students, parents, teachers, school leaders, small business owners, elected officials, and individuals – are gathering to raise awareness of the importance of opportunity in education and the doors that it opens. At its heart, that is what school choice is all about: opening doors. For families, school choice opens doors to different types of schools, making it more likely that students can find education settings that inspire them to succeed and be happy.

These options include traditional public schools, magnet schools, charter schools, private and parochial schools, virtual schools, and home schools. All of these choices are important, and all of these doors should be opened, because every child is unique. A school that works for one student may not work for another.

And school choice continues to open doors for students after they graduate.

With a strong K-12 education, students are more likely to be successful in college, in a vocational program, and in their careers.

In my eight years as President of National School Choice Week, I have witnessed story after story of children finding opportunities they never thought possible, precisely because of school choice.

I have seen students attend college and go on to graduate with masters' degrees, even though their parents hadn't finished high school.

I've seen students with special needs find a setting where they've thrived. I've seen students who discovered their passions, escaped bullying, and grew in confidence.

And that's what makes school choice – and National School Choice Week – so exciting.

Everyone can be a part of this celebration.

So whether you're looking for a school for your child and want to learn more about your options during the Week, or whether you take time to get informed about all the choices available in your area and share that awareness with others, you're helping the children in your neighborhood. Above all, I hope you will use National School Choice Week to open doors, for your family or for other families. The next generation will thank you.

Start today by visiting schoolchoiceweek.com.

If You're Buying or Selling A Home, These Four Insider Tips Can Help Chances are, if you've been in the market for a home, you've been outbid at least once. Or maybe you're a homeowner who can barely get a nibble from a potential buyer? Yes, it seems as if the real estate market is tricky for both buyers and sellers these days.

"Rising demand among millennials, full employment, and the strong economy have bumped against limited inventory," the Washington Post reports, "which fuels price increases." So what to do? Read on to find out some of the best insider tips.

Continue Reading: If You're Buying or Selling A Home, These Four Insider Tips Can Help

Russia warns of 'consequences' if US missiles go to Ukraine

How many houses have you been outbid on? And if you're an owner who can't even get a nibble out of buyers – if some barely even bother stepping inside – are you starting to feel like screaming? Yes, times are tricky for both buyers and sellers. "Rising demand among millennials, full employment, and the strong economy have bumped against limited inventory," the Washington Post reported, "which fuels price increases." What to do? Read on for some of the best insider tips.* January and February are the best months to buy. Forget the "experts" who warn you shouldn't try to time the market. A recent study from NerdWallet shows houses typically cost 8.45 percent less during those two months than in June and August. True, the pickings might be slimmer, given that most sellers list a house in the peak spring or summer seasons. However, not only are you less likely to be up against buyers with wads of cash – they're probably wintering in the likes of St. Barts – but you'll also stand to profit from a time-tested truth. "If their home is (still) on the market in fall or winter," notes the home improvement website BobVila.com, "chances are they'll be eager to close." With the median price of homes currently listed in the U.S. at $275,000, that 8.45 percent "discount" translates into a very un-chump change savings of more than $23,000 – and a lot more in pricier cities like San Francisco. Sellers, on the other hand, do best in the first half of May, according to Zillow.com.* Generation Z is quick to buy. We hear so much about Millennials these days, but those born after 1995 caught Zillow's attention for a very good reason: When they buy, they buy "quickly." More than two-thirds of those Gen Z buyers spent less than three months on their search, compared to 54 percent of Millennials listing photos online are twice as likely to be viewed by buyers," Trulia.com reports. Of course, that only applies if the house you're trying to sell is photo-worthy. (See "New Roof" above.) And if it isn't ... well, let's just say you might want to skip this tip.

Ukraine pushes West for missiles, warns of new refugee exodus

Long-distance caregiving for a parent or senior loved one is a difficult reality for many adults. A study by Home Instead, Inc., franchisor of the Home Instead Senior Care network, finds that 23 percent of American adults currently care for an older relative who lives more than an hour away. Providing care from a distance can be stressful.

But if relocating closer to a loved one is not an option, Home Instead recommends the following tips to make providing long-distance care a little easier:

1. Establish open communication – When visiting your loved one, make time to meet the individuals who are part of his or her everyday life. Whether that's a physician or caregiver, it's important to get to know those involved in the daily care of a loved one.
2. Be observant – Do your loved ones avoid answering specific questions about their health? Have they stopped participating in their usual activities? Are they unaware of current events or forgotten important dates? These may be warning signs that they need additional care or help around the house.
3. Be prepared – Create a list of your older adult's medical issues/medications, doctor's names, and legal documents in case you need to access them from afar during an emergency.
4. Spend quality time during visits – It's easy to get wrapped up in caregiving responsibilities. When you visit, set aside time with your loved one to participate in activities unrelated to caregiving. Go see a movie together, plan a visit to see other family members, go for a walk or simply relax at home.
5. Get to know neighbors and friends – Get to know your loved one's neighbors and identify one or two trustworthy individuals who can check in and give you occasional updates.
6. Learn more about caregiving – Find support to help you become a better caregiver. For example, Home Instead Senior Care offers resources that can help family members provide better care and learn skills, such as how to safely move someone from a bed to a chair, how to help someone bathe, and how to prevent and treat bed sores, as well as basic first aid. Family members looking for additional resources and support relating to long-distance caregiving can visit caregiver-stress.com or find a local Home Instead Senior Care office by going to www.homeinstead.com/state.

Terms of Syndication
Copyright NewsUSA, 2008.

ADDRESS :

1271 Avenue of the America, New York, 10020

WEBSITE :

http/www.time.com